the university where she's been working for quite a few years. Starting this September she'll be working the 8-5 shift at the lab doing research in the microbiology lab. I won't be able to go see her everyday but I still get to see her once a week or so. I thought I'd share a little of the experience so far. In the description under her job page on the university's website I posted how it is. I didn't think it would get that far in a few weeks. _____ "I wish

In addition to the gape and stellar radiance, this L-class star is also loaded with heavy elements, thanks to the waning spiral arms of its companion star. The universe is a vast library of majestic sights. But it's also teeming with early-stage stars that are still in the formative process. These newborn stellar births can be more colorful than their older, steadier counterparts. One particularly hot and gaudy L-class star, called KIC 7259548, has astronomers buzzing. The star sits in the constellation Cygnus, a historical home to stargazing's first known nova — the nova that inspired Isaac Newton's famous phrase, "Eureka! I have found it!" (For a compilation of the constellations and their homes, check out this map.) KIC 7259548 is a K-class dwarf star in a relatively tight, 13-year-long orbit around the A-type main-sequence star HD 75898. This is a type of system astronomers call a "dwarf-disk star binary," a kind of short-lived, hot start packed with heavy elements. Astronomers think the two bodies have recently begun to form a stellar companion, based on the star's proximity to Earth and its light blue-green hue. [Celebrate "Planetary Appreciation Day": 9 Things to Do on May 13] The star's fiery temperatures likely range from 15,000 to 16,000 degrees Fahrenheit (8,000 to 9,000 degrees Celsius). A new paper about KIC 7259548's star system has been published in The Astrophysical Journal, and the paper's authors show early signs that the star's light is being diluted and distorted by the companion star. It's the first time a dwarf-disk binary system
